Departments

Anthropology
The Anthropology Department at Rice specializes in social and cultural anthropology and archaeology. In social and cultural anthropology, students focus on the cultural roots of our world in the study of elites, gender, art, science, and medicine. Archaeology allows students to explore human prehistory through evidence of past human activities and excavations, notably in Africa. Anthropology offers both undergraduate and graduate programs.

Economics
The Economics Department at Rice specializes in microeconomic theory (how individuals make economic decisions), macroeconomics (how society makes economic decisions), applied economics (in health, tax, energy, labor, banking, finance), and econometrics (statistical theory and applications). Economics offers both undergraduate and graduate programs, including a major in Mathematical Economic Analysis.

Political Science
The Department of Political Science at Rice specializes in American politics (U.S. government, elections, and citizens' behavior), comparative politics (governments in other countries), and international relations (conflict and cooperation in the world). Political Science offers both
The Psychology Department at Rice University is a unique blend of basic and applied psychology. Our breadth of research interests creates a unique learning and research environment. The primary emphasis in the department is on research, in both laboratory and applied settings.
